

I believe that my unique culture is just one of many around the world.

I am curious about other cultures and try my best to learn more about them, although I don't get as many opportunities as I would like to interact with members of other cultures.

I do not normally change my behavior around people who are culturally different from me, but I am aware that my behavior may be seen as unusual to people outside of my culture.

I believe that, on the inside, people from other cultures are generally the same as me.

I attempt to treat other people as I would like to be treated, which means I do not belittle other cultures or agree with stereotypes.

I appreciate that people from other cultures speak and act differently from me, but I also believe that there are universal values that apply to all people no matter their culture.

Culture is not a very important issue to me. I prefer to stick with what I know rather than complicate life with "cultural difference."

In terms of culture, I am most interested in things like food, clothing, and the arts rather than exploring less-familiar aspects of cultural difference.

I just don't understand why people make such a big deal about cultural differences.

I deeply understand my own culture and have significant knowledge of at least one other culture. I also have the ability to see the world through a perspective different from my own.

I avoid interactions with people who are different from me because I am uncomfortable with strange people and situations.

I know how to act appropriately outside of my culture, and I am able to adapt my behavior to that of other cultures without the assistance of people from that culture.

I really admire some other cultures and wish my own group could be more like them.

I am aware of other cultures, but I'm not sure I understand them. I also associate negative stereotypes with some of these cultures.

I am committed to my worldview, and I tend to distrust any behaviors or ideas that differ from my own.

I would rather confront difficult international and multicultural issues than claim blissful ignorance.

I am aware of other cultures, and I understand that these cultures differ in terms of customs and everyday behavior.

Although their ideas, feelings, and behavior may seem strange to me, I know that people from other cultures' experiences are just as complex and "rich" as mine.

I often complain about people from other cultural groups.

I tend to seek out groups and experiences with people who are similar to me.

